

Aaron's Answers (continued from p. 1):

The city was called Rekeme back then after its royal founder, Rekem.

In AD 106, Petra was absorbed into the Roman Empire as part of a province called Arabia Petraea, and Petra quickly became its capital. Though its original dynasty had been ended, the city was still flourishing and bustling with traders under Roman rule. Eventually, a nearby city called Palmyra began to steal attention from Petra, but it still remained an important religious center. During the age of the Crusades, the crusaders built fortresses near Petra but were forced to leave when the position was no longer strategically sound. After that, Petra was abandoned and forgotten until early in the 19th century.

The first European to describe the city was a Swiss traveler named Johann Ludwig Burckhardt during his travels in 1812. At that time, the Greek Church of Jerusalem operated a diocese, or a bishop ruled district, in Al Karak named Battra and it was the opinion among the clergy of Jerusalem that Karak was the ancient city of Petra. Since then, it has become an important tourist attraction with many wonderful sights. The most famous point of interest is the Al-Khazneh, which was one of the elaborate temples built during Petra's golden age.
